Dough Joy’s guilt-free donuts make Seattle’s vegan nice list
When Sean Willis met Christopher Ballard on a brief trip to Seattle years ago, neither of them initially suspected they would someday jointly venture into veganism, let alone get engaged and launch a vegan-donut food-truck business together.

Nevertheless, Seattle is rarely the name they did. Doug Joy Donuts is currently parked in Ballard — with occasional pop-ups across the city — and the truck has consistently sold out before closing since it launched in late May.

Vegan at first sight

Ballard says he accidentally began to phase out meat while cooking and going out to restaurants with already-vegetarian Willis, with dairy following shortly after. “I don’t really know when it happened, but at some point, I just went vegan, and we have been vegan ever since,” he said. “Now it’s really something that we bond over and share together — the excitement of finding new restaurants and food together.”

Sharing that enjoyment with each other apparently wasn’t enough; the couple wanted to share it with others too. Ballard and Willis initially showcased their love of plant-based living by publishing a quarterly travel magazine called Outbound Herbivore. Now in its fifth issue, it aims to explore common questions people who are exploring plant-based lifestyles have along the way, according to Willis.

“The name came from ‘out,’ because we’re out and proud, and then ‘outbound’ because it was originally about traveling and finding food,” said Ballard. “Unfortunately, shortly after we really took off with Outbound online, COVID started, so we weren’t really traveling all that much, mainly eating local.”

Since then, the pair has helped host mini vegan markets, dinner pop-ups, and online events out of their kitchen. “We really wanted to just build a community here,” said Willis. “Not necessarily just people who were vegan, but showing people that were curious about incorporating more plant-based foods into their diet that doing so could be easy, it could be fun, there are lots of options. And that’s kind of our philosophy about promoting vegan food.”

Deep-fried dedication

Given the growing local network of vegan-friendly business owners and plant-based food companies, the pair found themselves confronted with an opportunity to add their own product to the scene. They knew the needs in the market and the wishes of the vegan community well, and that one universal challenge for vegan menus persisted in Seattle: desserts.

Vegan donut recipes the couple had tested at home became the basis of the Dough Joy menu, which features fun and seasonal flavor profiles, like the current pumpkin seed butter donut.

The couple’s goals of highlighting veganism as trendy and worthwhile are well known to customers due to quirky design ideas from their team. Not only are their products delectable vegan treats, but they are totally Insta-worthy (and where else can you find a vegan mango chile donut?).

Ballard and Willis’s involvement in Seattle’s plant-based dining community led them to seek out a food truck. In early 2021, Pass on from one vegan venture to the next, Cycle Dogs’ truck was ready to work and available, and Doug Joy moved into a fixed location in Ballard this year.

Coming soon to Capitol Hill

In its nearly six months of selling out daily, Doug Joy has surely proven that it’s noticed by the community by its mission to “do donuts differently.” The handmade, fresh-daily products and top-notch service have paid off, as the business is now gathering the final permits to open on Capitol Hill next month, at the location of previously adored Old School Frozen Custard.

Customers have themselves to thank for the new brick-and-mortar venture — the purchase was made possible entirely through a Kickstarter campaign this fall. Though launched just three short weeks ago, the campaign has officially secured its purchase as of November 13, with $41,324 raised from 445 backers.

Ballard, originally from Wenatchee, expressed his love of Seattle and Capitol Hill for giving him and his new fiancé a home where they can continue to do what they love and be a part of a larger LGBTQ+ business community.

“People misunderstand that having a larger concentration of vegan businesses actually doesn’t hurt them; it helps them all. It brings a vegan identity to that place,” said Willis. “We’re really excited to be surrounded by other queer-owned vegan businesses,” said Ballard.

Doug Joy’s scheduled opening day at 1316 E. Pike is December 15, but Ballard and Willis say they are prepared for the possibility of delays due to ongoing national shortages. In the meantime, the pair looks forward to providing double their current production and bringing an innovative, queer-owned, plant-based donut shop to Capitol Hill.

Gift guide

Bring Doug Joy to your loved ones this holiday season. A dozen fresh, colorful, seasonal donuts runs for $40, or a gift card for the new location could give someone a sweet December date idea.

Cute Crafts and Queer Vendors

Urban Craft Uprising’s Winter Show
by Nick Rapp
SGN Contributing Writer

As winter approaches, holiday music is blasting out of the speakers of every retail establishment in Seattle. Gifts are another story. Global supply chain shortages are messing with businesses and their activities. But now and then, we get the more dire the situation is expected to become.

Many people are rushing to buy all their gifts early. Some are opting for a last-minute delivery for the unforseen circumstances of the holiday season. But rushing to support the e-commerce monopoly may not be your only choice this year.

One of the Northwest’s largest indie maker-event organizers, Urban Craft Uprising, has two major craft fairs coming in December.

Independent crafter events focus on showcasing the best of local vendors’ products to build community and offer a more personalizable approach to buying gifts for others (or yourself). Urban Craft Uprising’s Winter Show is its main event; it takes place December 4 and 5 in Seattle Center Exhibition Hall (10 a.m. to 6 p.m. on Saturday and 10 a.m. to 5 p.m. on Sunday). The event is free to attend, with an encouraged $1 donation upon entrance.

The Winter Show will feature over 100 vendor booths selling all sorts of goods, including art, accessories, books, bath & body items, candles, ceramics, clothing, food, and much more. It has grown since its 20-vendor beginnings in 2005 to become the largest indie craft event in the Pacific Northwest.

While the pandemic threw a wrench into the possibility of independent craft events this year, vendors are back and ready to sell unique crafts to crowds hoping for a more personal and enjoyable holiday season.

Kristen Rask, president of Urban Craft Uprising, has much to say on the excitement brought by this year’s Winter Show.

“Honestly, there’s just so excited to connect with our vendors and customers. Small businesses have been hit hard in the pandemic, and we appreciate the support. Not only financially, but mentally, as it’s been hard for many vendors to be more active online. While some have thrived, many have struggled, said Rask.

She continued, “For me, clicking buttons and trying to get special gifts for people online only is challenging to say the least. Our holiday last year felt very ‘meh’; it’s because we couldn’t shop with independent makers and artists. Now supply chain issues this year, I feel like it’s the best way to shop — with makers and small businesses.”

A crafter herself, Rask has been a part of Urban Craft Uprising since 2008. When asked about the organization’s growth since then, Rask responded, “When I started, we did one holiday show. Since then, we have grown a lot. We now do over 30 events a year (in non-COVID times, she specified).”

These events include a summertime show, one around Thanksgiving (“Gobble Up!” in Portland and Seattle), a handmade gift show in January, and plenty of others. Rask explained that Urban Craft Uprising has “learned a lot since COVID,” and “will once again evolve in this new way of life.”

Gift guide
If you are looking to get advance access to the crafts at the Winter Show, Urban Craft Uprising is offering a “preview night,” from 5 p.m. to 8 p.m. on the Friday before the show, December 3, to the first 1,000 fans who register online. These tickets are available at eventbrite.com/e/ucu-preview-night-2021-tickets-193932972591; make sure to buy early.

Rask also offered up a list of some of the many vendors selling their goods at the event.

Citizen Ruth is an ethics-forward company providing high-quality, intersectional feminist art, books, clothing, jewelry, and personal and home accessories. Its focus is on creating empowering crafts and practicing what it preaches by compensating its employees with livable wages.

Junebug & Darlin sells a range of beautiful floral cross-stitch crafts alongside wittier, progressive phrases. It also gives customers the chance to craft themselves. From the website: “We sell cross-stitch kits that are 100% handmade and provide all of the supplies needed for people to create a finished cross-stitch from first stitch to frame.”

Dark Days Tarot features unique decks of tarot cards, inspired by the lunar cycle and the artist’s own interest in the “moon, Earth, botanical world, animal kingdom, mortality and bodies, queerness, and psychology.”

Ida Loves Dresses sells adorable children’s dresses, tees, and tote bags, “inspired (and sometimes co-designed) by the artist’s own child.”

All vendor quotes were pulled from their respective websites. Read more about their crafts at: citizenruth.com; junebuganddarlin.com; www.darkdaystatorot.com; and idalovesdresses.com.

Shop Babeland this holiday season
The roots of patriarchy penetrate deeper than one could ever imagine. That is what Babeland founders Claire Cavanah and Rachael Venning realized after searching up and down Seattle for a well-lit and comfortable sex-toy shop. Even though sex toys are often necessary tools for APAB (assigned female at birth) people seeking pleasure, the two found that the stores they explored continued to pandering to the patriarchy and often gave off sleazy vibes.

Tackling matters into their own hands, they decided to erect their own business: Toys in Babeland. Centering the female experience and offering encouragement to women who wanted to explore their sexuality, their shop soon became a huge success. People from all over Seattle began petitioning it, encouraged by the gentle atmosphere and top-quality products.

Two years after the store's opening in 1993, Cavanah and Venning decided to expand Toys in Babeland's reach with its very own mail-order catalog. A year later, they launched a website, and Babeland soon sent vibrations throughout the nation.

In 1998, the pair moved to New York City, where they opened up another store, this one on the glamorous Lower East Side. Since then, they have opened over two more stores, one in Brooklyn and another in SoHo.

The original Babeland still operates in Capitol Hill with a mission to “promote and celebrate sexual diversity by providing an honest, open, and fun environment and encouraging personal empowerment, community education, and support for a more passionate world.”

Other ventures
Meanwhile, Cavanah and Venning continue to take the world by storm. In 2003 they published the first-ever full-color guide to gear for satisfying sex, Sex Toys For. In 2006 they published a second book, Moregasm, a female drive guide to “mind-blowing” sex. In 2005 they officially celebrated the success of their store by shortening the name to just Babeland, placing an emphasis on the word as a destination, a lifestyle, and a state of mind.

The founders of Babeland acknowledge that sexual pleasure can only occur after all of one’s basic needs have first been met. With that in mind, they decided to launch their philanthropic project, “Come for a Cause.” It aims to create tangible social change on local, national, and global levels.

Throughout the year, Babeland partners with different organizations to support the social change they hope to see in the world.

Currently, Babeland is partnering with the Sex, Drugs, and Smith conference, a group that provides sexuality workshops taught by professionals and centers around the sexual liberation of marginalized communities, especially the LGBTQ+ community.

Babeland is also partnering with the Transgender Law Center, the largest national Trans-led organization, and the Act Blue List, which provides bail funds, mutual aid funds, and racial justice organizers in response to injustices against Black lives.

Gift guide
Santa won't be the only one coming down the chimney this Christmas Eve—thanks to Babeland's great selection of toys for everyone on your naughty list.

Gift recommendations include the Together Vibrating Double ($220), a shared couple’s vibrator designed to heighten intimacy by encouraging eye-to-eye contact. The Meltdown Clitoral Stimulator ($140) is a slim waterproof vibrator designed to fit perfectly between two bodies; it has 12 vibration modes and can connect with the WE-Vibe app so it can be used between partners anywhere. Bedband Ball Stretch Army ($35) is a two-in-one cock ring and ball stretcher that will blow minds with the size of your package. The Soft Stump STP Packer ($75) is the perfect packer, allowing you to stand to pee, fill it with any size boner or brief. The Touch and Glow Dildo ($47) is made with lifelike silicone that feels like skin and is crafted to look true to life; it's in any size strap and also comes with a strong suction cup — plus it glows in the dark!
The Mountain's Out this Winter

In 2018, Henry Waymack of Tacoma went looking for "get out the vote" apparel, but he didn’t quite find what he was looking for. Instead, he found items that had a significantly jaded view of political participation or produced by large, national nonprofits, and specific political campaigns. As a graphic designer and a Queer man of Trans experience, he put his skill to use creating his ideal products.

"The first item I designed were enamel 'I Voted' pins, one with an American Flag and the other with the Philadelphia Pride Flag, which had just debuted that summer in 2018," Waymack recalled. "Since then, the designs have expanded to include a variety of progressive issues and items -- beyond apparel. I continue to design new products for Left of Rainier throughout the year."

He said two of the most popular designs are: "Be Gay Do Crime," white in a pink triangle, and the "Mountain is Out" designs. Both will now be available as patches "very soon," available as iron-on and velcro options, according to Waymack. "When people visit Left of Rainier (hosted on Etsy), I hope folks will find something fun and meaningful both for themselves or as gifts for their friends and loved ones," he said.

Waymack grew up in Seattle and graduated from Roosevelt High School in 2000. He moved to Tacoma that same fall to attend Pacific Lutheran University (PLU). By the time he graduated, he’d grown to really love the city and has called Tacoma his home ever since.

Knock their Socks Off this Christmas

The Sock Monster offers more than just stockings

by Lindsey Anderson
SGN Contributing Writer

We’ve all been there: Christmas morning, all the gifts under the tree — and then, amidst the sparkles and gadgets sits a pair of tube socks. Nobody wants them, and nobody wants to be the basic gift-giver who brought them. Yet they somehow show up, worse than coal.

One Seattle business is reimagining socks, delivering the most unique, sturdy, and highly requested footwear in the country. In just a little over a decade, The Sock Monster has become the most renowned sock gift shop in the Pacific Northwest.

It’s now a Seattle staple, a must-see as important as Pike Place Market or the Space Needle. Visitors from near and far flock to the unique store to get a look at the largest selection of socks in Washington state.

In its “slove,” the Sock Monster is a women-run and women-supported business. It was first opened in 2010 by Holly Gimmell, a Seattle woman looking to spread her love of color and creativity. Gimmell always wanted to support local artisans and provide quality and ethically sourced goods to her community.

So for the last eleven years, the Sock Monster has provided a space for Seattle-based artists to showcase their work while also managing to only distribute products from factories that work hard to support fair-trade and sustainable practices.

In 2019 Gimmell stepped down as owner, making way for longtime manager Kelly Tremaine to step in. Tremaine continued Gimmell’s goal of running an ethical and fair-trade business.

From its first days, the Sock Monster has also always been a safe space for LGBTQ+ people, and Tremaine and Gimmell have actively voiced their support and pride in the community through the store’s social media accounts.

When asked what she recommends as the perfect gift for the holiday season, Tremaine couldn’t pick just one product. “Oh my gosh, there are so many things! We specialize in a million different socks!” she exclaimed. “We also offer organic wool socks, definitely something you don’t find every day.”

Tremaine did offer a recommendation, though: “Darn Tough wool socks. They come with an unconditional lifetime guarantee.” While those socks tend to last on the more expensive side, they’re worth it when you realize you’ll never have to buy new ones again. “They change people’s lives,” Tremaine said. “If you ever get a hole in it, you can just trade it in. They come in boot socks and ankle socks.”

Sock Monster is so serious about these “life-changing” socks that they have dedicated a whole wall to them. For anyone into the outdoors, these are the perfect hiking, skiing, or just trudging around Seattle winter socks. Darn Tough socks also come in many different styles, including a Pride rainbow.

Tremaine mentioned Oooh Yeah as one of her favorite brands. “They have all kinds of fun ones; rainbow unicorns, flamin-gos, cats, cows, you name it.” The brand features anything a shopper could be into, from celebrities like Bob Ross, TV shows like Stranger Things, and even a pair with the face of a recipe for grilled cheese on them! Oooh Yeah has also come out with a line of slippers called Oooh Geez, which are now available at the Sock Monster.

Socks aren’t the only gifts you’ll find at the Sock Monster, though. “We’ve also got hats and scarves and leggings,” said Tremaine, “as well as enamel pins, stickers, and blind boxes.”

If you want to go down in the holiday history books as the greatest gift giver in the family, take a trip to the Sock Monster. There’s something for everyone. Nobody will be complaining about finding these socks under the tree!

Fantagraphics
An old guard on the vanguard

by Daniel Lindsay
SGN Contributing Writer

In such a literary town as Seattle, the right book can be someone’s gift of the year. And with winter only just beginning around Christmas, a new book to curl up with is timely.

But unless the gift, in question is already a comic book geek, it’s typical to default to fiction, poetry, or even self-help. The lineup at Fantagraphics, though, as its social media and events manager Lauren Pugh attests, will likely change that.

Pugh spoke with me over Zoom from Fantagraphics’ Seattle office. Nestled between the tall, colorful bookshelves were posters, figurines, stickers, and cardboard cut-outs — the many layers of decoration serving as a telling sign of the publisher’s rich past.

Fantagraphics was founded in College Park, Maryland in 1976 and after relocating a few times, in 1989, it settled down in the Maple Leaf neighborhood of Seattle. Pugh says the city’s strong arts scene and very literary residents have made it an ideal place for the headquarters.

Since its founding, Fantagraphics has published more famous series and artists than could be listed here, so Pugh and I focused on what’s new.

“I’ve always been more partial to the kinds of books Fantagraphics publishes, as opposed to superhero stories,” Pugh told me. “We tend to publish narratives more than superhero stories... They’re actually really accessible to people who don’t normally read comics.”

At one time, Pugh was one of those people. She says she arrived at the hobby only recently, in the early months of the COVID-19 pandemic, when as an avid reader, she was suddenly finding it hard to concentrate on traditional books.

“I found graphic novels, for some reason, were the only thing that could hold my attention,” she said. “So, I would just scan the spines and look for the Fantagraphics logo and grab whatever I found, just like, ‘I don’t care what it is, I know I’ll enjoy it.’”

Now she has been at Fantagraphics for a year. “It’s really fun seeing how the sausage is made,” she said. “And I love getting early access to great comics.”

Fantagraphics usually connects with the Seattle community by hosting in-person events, notably a number of panels at the annual Emerald City Comic-Con (ECCC).

Last year, like so many other organizations, it switched to hosting virtual events only.

Pugh says Fantagraphics’ in-person presence at ECCC this year will be minimal, with only one artist panel so far, although it does plan to celebrate its Georgetown bookstore’s 15th anniversary in December. (The store is at 1201 S. Vale Street, at Airport Way S.)

Aside from problems in the supply chain, though, its sales have only grown during the pandemic. Many of its employees work remotely, and its artists are all over the world, so adjusting wasn’t hard.

But while Fantagraphics is global, Seattle is special because of its arts scene. Pugh said of Seattle, “There are so many creative, talented people. I’m constantly shocked by it.”

Gift guide

This year Fantagraphics is giving back with early discounts on its books in its holiday gift guide, which can be found on the website (www.fantagraphics.com). Here are some suggestions:

Stone Fruit by Lee Lai: especially recommended by Pugh, described as a queer narrative and “an ode to love and connection shared by three women and the child they all adore.”

Queen of the Ring: Wrestling Drawings by Jaime Hernandez: by the artist who made the famed Love and Rockets series, celebrating the “often forgotten” women in pro-wrestling.

Red Room: The Antisocial Network by Ed Piskor: a gory series of “outlaw, cyberpunk” comics in which a dark web organization has begun to livestream murders.

No One Else by K. Kikako Johnson, a graphic novel about “tender truths” by the author of the critically acclaimed literary novel Night Fisher.
